October 17, 2017
††Updated 11/1/17 †10/24

Spending by independent special interest groups is on pace to shatter records for a legislative election as an intense battle in the 3rd legislative district shapes up as the most expensive in state history, according to reports filed with the New Jersey Election Law Enforcement Commission (ELEC).

Including the primary, there already has been $12.9 million†† in independent spending on the 2017 legislative elections. That represents the second largest amount since the 2013 total of $16.1 million. The current total, which is only preliminary, already has eclipsed the $11.6 million spent in the 2015 legislative campaigns.

*Preliminary

“We have been predicting since 2010 that independent groups would become a major force in New Jersey campaigns. This year’s campaign lends further credence to that prediction,” said Jeff Brindle, ELEC’s Executive Director.

“The growing influence of these groups makes it more important than ever for the Legislature to update state laws to reflect recent U.S. Supreme court rulings that permit full disclosure by independent groups,” he said. “Both parties have bills pending that would bring this about. We hope there will be action on this critical legislation after the election.”

Reports that reflect campaign finance activity through October 6, which is 29 days before the November 7 general election, show legislative candidates have raised $26.9 million, spent $12.2 million, and report $14.7 million in cash reserves headed into the campaign’s final stretch. Overall spending so far in the race, including independent committees, is $22.9 million†.

Much of the independent money is flooding into the 3rd legislative district.

The New Jersey Education Association (NJEA) is spending heavily against Senate President Stephen Sweeney (D-3rd) of West Deptford, who has represented the district since 2002. NJEA is supporting his Republican opponent, Fran Grenier of Woodstown. The union represents about 200,000 teachers and other school employees.

Using its federal 527 political fund-raising committee named Garden State Forward, the teachers union has been running advertisements continuously since mid-summer on Philadelphia network television stations and sponsored digital ads even earlier.

Television advertisements countering NJEA's broadsides have been run by Sweeney's personal and joint legislative fundraising committees, a 527 political committee called New Jerseyans for a Better Tomorrow that was formed by Sweeney supporters, and the Carpenters Fund for Growth and Progress, which supports the fellow trade union member.

Research by ELEC indicates that the $6.1 million campaign in 2003 between Democratic Senator Fred Madden (D-4th) and Republican George Geist drew the most money ever to a legislative district. In current dollars, it cost $8.2 million.

Preliminary numbers indicate that spending in this year's 3rd district race already has surpassed
